One sentence two readings

How can punctuation change the way an invented message is understood?

Two versions

Copy or point to both versions with the same words.

The addressed listener

Which version speaks to Pip?

The pictured subject

Which version asks for a picture of Pip?

A clearer message

How could a short explanation make the intended task obvious?

Find a rule in invented words

What pattern can a small set of made-up words support?

Observed pairs

Mark the shared and changed parts in both supplied pairs.

My rule

State a rule no broader than the examples support.

A prediction

Use the new one-star label to predict a two-star label.

An unknown case

What further card would separate a pair rule from a general plural rule?

Keep it, change it or leave it here. Sharing is optional.

Two ways to express one idea

Which part of a meaning survives when the wording changes?

Required details

List timing, object and destination.

A matching version

Which details survive in the first paraphrase?

A changed version

Point to at least one changed requirement in the second.

My wording

Choose a fictional audience and write a version that keeps the needed details.
